Specifications: Homepage: File Size: 45 MB Download: a.m. on a Tuesday, a frustrated call from a mother of a toddler born to severely low-birth-weight babies. "Do you know if your center does fetal heart sounds?" she asked. This was the first time the mother had called the Rady Children's Hospital, a Kaiser Permanente facility near downtown San Diego. She had already called several times, and each time was passed along to a human resources representative, who never returned the calls. Kaiser is working with the county health department to increase training for its caregivers on how to perform fetal heart-rate monitoring at hospital births, starting as early as 16 weeks of pregnancy. But no such program exists in San Diego County. Nearly all hospitals in the region rely on caregivers, such as nurses, who do basic cardiac monitoring in the delivery rooms, but they are not specially trained to monitor fetal heart tones, a critical step in low-birth-weight babies. "It's unacceptable that all this labor is going on and they have no heart rate monitoring," said Dr. Amy Welch, a Kaiser physician who serves as a clinical associate professor at the University of California, San Diego's Moores Cancer Center. Welch was one of three local doctors who recently joined an online training program at the Institute of HeartMath in California to help them become more effective educators of heart rate monitoring and other heart-rate and fetal-position monitoring. This kind of training is in high demand, said the institute's president, Connie Gutnick, who said trainees are traveling from as far away as North Dakota, Louisiana, Pennsylvania, and Maryland. The institute, a nonprofit that is based in California, works with hospitals to train caregivers to monitor fetal heart rates and recognize fetal positions. From mid-2011 to mid-2012, there were about 1.8 million births in the U.S., and half of them took place in hospitals, according to the March 2013 issue of the journal Obstetrics and Gynecology. About five million babies are born prematurely each year, according to the federal government. Babies born too early can't breathe on their own, don't have skin or are
