Ask HN: How do you pass out your personal business cards? - senthil_rajasek I have 5-6 "business cards" for different jobs I've taken on over the last year (nothing big with start ups but a few interesting side projects) that I collect over time. I wanted to pass these out and was wondering how people usually do it. Assuming my current procedure, I'll get a stack of business cards, wet the entire stack at the top, fold it over itself so the business card is sticking out and have it looking nice before hand. Even though I've done this numerous times, I know this can be hard to do. Not only do you want the business cards to look good but you also want them to lay flat and end up face up on the table. I'm interested in what techniques people have developed over time. I've attached a picture below of the current process I follow. I'd like to get feedback on what techniques you guys have developed/ used to create this neat stack of business cards. A: @Bart I totally agree with you. I haven't used business cards because they are way too old fashion. Recently I use for "Slide-Letter" and "Note-Slide". A: I would lay them out flat on a table. After you had set them out, your hand will naturally fold them nicely. It would be as if you were pushing them into the table. If you want, you can press them down on a piece of cardboard so they can be folded if Indeed, somatostatin inhibits mTOR signaling and has been shown to be effective in experimental and clinical studies. In addition, somatostatin may be effective through the inhibition of the adenosine A~2A~ receptor, which also inhibits mTOR activity \[@CR41\]. This may explain the synergism observed in the combination of IFN- α and octreotide in the treatment of DIPN. Moreover, in a phase 2 trial conducted by Nahmias et al. \[@CR42\], patients with relapsed or refractory chronic lymphocytic leukemia were treated with a combination of IFN- α and octreotide and reported a clinically meaningful and statistically significant improvement in overall response rate (81 % vs. 43 %). The authors concluded that the combination of octreotide and IFN- α appeared to be more effective than IFN- α alone, though it was not possible to establish a causal relationship given the small sample size. We suggest that our results extend these findings to patients with DIPN. In addition to their effects on the sensory fibers, IFN- α and octreotide appear to be synergistically effective in increasing the number of remissions. This finding might help explain why IFN- α and octreotide are frequently combined to treat patients with DIPN, despite only modest effects of the individual agents on sensory 3e33713323
