crystal meth blue is recognised to have a high addiction risk (i.e., a high possibility that long-term or high dose use would result in compulsive drug use) as well as a high dependence risk. crystal meth blue withdrawal with heavy use may result in a post-acute withdrawal syndrome that can last for months beyond the typical withdrawal phase.

At large doses, crystal meth blue is neurotoxic to human midbrain dopaminergic neurons. Meth has been proven to have a higher affinity than amphetamine and, as a result, a higher toxicity toward serotonergic neurons. crystal meth blue neurotoxicity results in adverse changes in brain structure and function, including decreases in the amount of grey matter in several brain regions as well as adverse changes in the markers of metabolic integrity.

Levo-methamphetamine and Dextromethamphetamine are the two enantiomers of crystal meth blue , which was discovered in 1893. Levomethamphetamine is not as strong of a CNS stimulant as dextromethamphetamine. Methamphetamine and dextromethorphan are both improperly trafficked and stored due to their potential for recreational use.

crystal meth blue is a man-made substance that has been used for as long as World War II, when older people used it to stay awake and alert to danger. Many people use crystal meth to lose weight and treat despair. The only legal meth product available today is a tablet used to treat obesity and attention deficit hyperactivity disorder (ADHD).

crystal meth blue is created using the toxic pseudophene, which is present in many cold medicines. crystal meth blue is available as a bright blue-white rock or a clear crystal chunk. It is commonly known as "ice" or "glass" and is still used as a party drug.
